

THE COST OF A FIRE

You come home to your apartment after a stressful day. You are hungry and decide to make some fresh French Fries. After putting the pot of oil on the stove to heat up, you remember that you also need to get your laundry going. You leave your apartment and head down the hallway to the apartment laundry room. After putting the laundry in the washing machine, you head back to your apartment.

When you get back to your apartment door, you smell smoke and hear the smoke alarm inside your apartment alarming. Remembering that you left the pot of oil on the burner, you quickly open the door and see your kitchen is on fire. Quickly closing the door to your apartment, you run down the hallway where you pull the building fire alarm. You then go outside to your planned meeting place and call the fire department.

The fire department arrives quickly and extinguishes the fire. The fire investigator determines that the fire started due to unattended cooking. Fortunately, most of the fire remained in the kitchen, but there is smoke damage throughout. Your property manager understands that it was unintentional, but explains that you will need to find another place to live for the next 1-2 months for repairs to be completed.

Unfortunately, you did not purchase renters insurance. Due to the smoke damage, you will need to cover the cost to replace many of your belongings.
